~ The Markets are Volatile, Your Broker Shouldn't Be ~

This past quarter has seen remarkable volatility for the global markets, between the European debt crisis that at one point it appeared the collapse of the Euro was all but inevitable, to a oil spill of historic proportions. In the second quarter we have seen the dollar strengthen against all the major currencies except the Canadian Dollar and Japanese Yen. Through all this economic turmoil we have managed to end this quarter on a very strong note. One of the biggest changes we made last quarter was to our trading strategy, we recognized that our strategy could not account for increase volatility, so as a result we incorporated a more fundamental outlook with chart pattern recognition rather than using lagging indicators. This change in our strategy is the primary reason we were able to navigate these markets through out the quarter. Forward looking we will continue to keep an eye on US unemployment reports, the European debt crisis, equity markets, Asian economic data from China and Australia, and the oil spill as all these events continue to impact the currency market. Third quarter expectations include the uncertainty surrounding the strength and pace of the US recovery, China's speculative housing bubble, the impact of the European debt crisis on global growth and the continuing reform and tightening regulations of financial markets across the globe.
